In-, pref.[1], the prep. and adv. IN, in comb. with vbs., vbl. derivs., and other words. In OE. the adv. inn, in, was freely used in collocation with vbs. of motion or change of state. In the infinitive the adv. generally stood before the vb., and in derived vbl. sbs. and adjs. always so. In this position the adv. came at length to be written in comb. with the vb.; hence, many regular compounds with stress on in-, thus incoming, income, incomer, indweller, inlet, insight, etc. Other formations, in which the prefix usually has the sense 'in, within, internal', are inborn, inside, inward, etc.

In- pref.[2], repr. L. in- adv. and prep., used in comb. with vbs. or their derivatives, less commonly with other parts of speech, with the senses 'into, in, within; on, upon; towards, against', sometimes expressing onward motion or continuance, sometimes intensive, sometimes transitive, and in other cases with no appreciable force. For Form-history, see EN-, IL-[1], IM-[1], IR-[1].

In-, pref.[3], the L. in-, cogn. w. Gr. a-, av-, Com. Teut. un-, prefixed to adjs. and their derivatives, rarely to other wds., to express negation or privation. In Eng. the modern tendency is to restrict in- to words obviously answering to Latin types, and to prefer the OE. negative un- in other cases, as unavailing, uncertain, undevout.

In-, pref.[4], of Teut. origin, prefixed to OE. and ME. adjs., with the sense 'inly', 'intimately', 'thoroughly', and hence 'exceedingly', 'very'.

-ine, suffix 1, forming adjs., repr. L. -īnus, -īna, -īnum, with the sense 'of' or 'pertaining to', 'of the nature of'. Examples are L. adulterinus adulterine, divinus divine, femininus feminine, etc.; also, Alpinus Alpine, etc. The termination is now greatly used in Nat. Hist., in forming adjs. on the names of genera, as acarine, accipitrine, etc. In these Nat. Hist. adjs. the pronunciation is (-əin), usually unstressed; but in other words it is very various; cf. divine (-əi·n), marine (-ī·n), feminine (-in), leonine (-əin). Also riverine.

-ine, suffix 2, forming adjs., repr. L. -inus, a. Gr. -ινος, as adamantinus adamantine, pristinus pristine, etc. The etym. and historical pronunciation is (-in), e.g. (pri·stin), (ædămа·ntin); but cf. crystalline (-əin), etc.

-ine, suffix 3, repr. F. -ine, L. -ina, Gr. -ίνη, forming fem. titles, as in Gr. ἡρωίνη, L. heroina, F. héroïne heroine. See also landgravine, margravine.

-ine, suffix 4, forming sbs., repr. F. -ine (-in), L. -ina (-inus), in origin identical with -INE ¹. The adjs. in -inus, -ina were also used subst., as in concubinus, -ina concubine, Antoninus Antonine, etc. The Eng. form of those in -ina is -ine, occas. -in; those in -inus give F. and Eng. -in, but in Eng. often -ine.

In Romanic, and hence in Eng. in the F. form -ine (-ī·n), this suffix is greatly used in forming names of derived substances, similative appellations, diminutives, etc.; e.g. dentine, grenadine, etc.

-ine, suffix 5, Chem., in origin an offshoot of -INE ⁴, as occurring in the names of some derived substances; see GELATIN, -INE. At first the ending -ine was by some reduced to -in; but recently, in systematic nomenclature, -ine is now used (1) in forming names of alkaloids and basic substances, as aconitine, etc., which are thus distinguished from names of neutral substances, proteids, etc., in -in (see -IN ¹); and (2) in Hofmann's systematic names of hydrocarbons of the form C_nH_{2n-2}, as ethine or acetylene, C_2H_2, etc. In the names of the elements, etc., -ine is retained. In pop. and commercial use, -ine is still current in some cases where systematic nomenclature requires -in; see -IN ¹.

-ine, as used to form the names of minerals, has in later use been changed, in the names of species, to -ite; thus chalcosine, erythrine are in Dana chalcocite, erythrite.

In Eng. the suffix is used also in a multitude of terms having no corresponding words in -ize or -ism, which denominate the professed followers of some leader or school, the professional devotees of some principle, or the practisers of some art. In some cases the form in -ist is distinguished from the agent-noun in -er only by the more professional or systematic sense which it implies: cf. copier, copyist; cycler, cyclist; philologer, philologist.

-ize (also written -ise), suffix forming vbs. = F. -iser, It. -izzare, Sp. -izar, ad. late L. -izare, f. Gr. -ίζειν, formative derivative of verbs. The suffix, whatever the element to which it is added, is in its origin the Gr. -ίζειν, L. -izare; and, as the pronunciation is also with z, there is no reason why in English the special French spelling in -iser should ever be followed. Hence here the termination is uniformly written -ize. In current English the following are the chief groups:

1. Words from Greek, or formed on Greek elements; a. with the trans. sense of 'make or conform to, or treat in the way of, the thing expressed by the derivation', as baptize, anathematize, monopolize, etc.; b. with the intrans. sense 'to act some person or character, do or follow some practice', as apologize, philosophize, etc.

2. Words formed on Latin adjs. or sbs., mostly with the trans. sense 'to make (that which is expressed by the derivation)', as actualize, colonize, satirize, etc.; trans. or intrans., as cicatrize, moralize, etc.; occas. only intrans., as temporize.

3. Words from later sources, as bastardize, jeopardize trans., gormandize intr.

4. Words formed on ethnic adjs., and the like, chiefly trans., as Americanize, Anglicize, etc.

5. Words formed on names of persons, sometimes with the intrans. Gr. sense of 'to act like, or in accordance with', as in Calvinize, but usu. in the trans. sense of 'to treat like, or after the method of, or according to the (chemical or other) process of'; as in Boucherize, Bowdlerize, galvanize, etc.; with other terms, and nonce-words such as Gladstonize, etc., without limit.

6. From names of substances, chemical and other; in the trans. sense of 'to charge, impregnate, treat, or affect with'; as alcoholize, oxidize, etc.; so in nonce-words, as Londonize to make like London, etc.

J

J (dʒē), the tenth letter of the English alphabet, is, in its origin, a comparatively late modification of the letter I. From the 11th to the 17th c., the letter I i represented both the vowel sound of i, and a consonant sound (dʒ). To keep the inconspicuous small i distinct, esp. in cursive writing, various scribal expedients were employed (see I). Among these, an initial i was often prolonged above or below the line, or both; a final i was generally prolonged below the line, and in both cases the 'tail' in cursive writing at length became a curve. The 'dot' was also used with the tailed form, and thus arose the modern j, j. But this was at first merely a final form of i, used in Latin in such forms as 'filij', and in numerals, as j, ij, xij. It was in the 17th c. that the differentiation of the two forms of the letter took place, i, i remaining for the vowel, and j, j being used for the consonant, and the capital forms of the latter, J, J, being introduced.

The sound regularly denoted by the letter J in English is the consonant (dʒ). In hallelujah it has the sound of the Roman i-consonant (y). So in proper names or alien terms from German and other languages in which the Roman value of j is retained, as Jena (yē·nă), Jaeger, etc. In a few French words, distinctly recognized as alien, j has the French sound (ʒ), as dejeuner, etc. In the transliteration of Oriental names, as Jât, Jenghiz, etc., j is used with its English value.

I. 1. The letter. (pl. Js, J's, js, j's.) 2. Short for J-pen, a broad-pointed pen, stamped with the letter J.

II. 1. Rarely used to express serial order. In the alphabetical designations of the batteries of the Royal Artillery, A, B, C, etc., J is used for the tenth. 2. As a Roman numeral j was formerly used as a final form of i in j, ij, vj, etc.; this is retained in medical prescriptions. 3. In Math. and Physics, J is used to denote the Jacobian; also Joule's mechanical equivalent of heat.

III. Abbrevs. J. stands for various proper names, as John, Jane, etc. J.P., Justice of Peace; Jr., jr., Junior. J.C.R., junior COMMON-ROOM.

K

K (kā), the eleventh letter of the alphabet in English, was an original letter of the Roman alphabet, taken from the Greek Kappa Κ, originally ⋋, from Phœnician and general Semitic Kaph ≻. Its sound in Greek and Latin was, as in English, that of the back voiceless stop consonant, or guttural tenuis. But at an early period of Latin orthography, the letter C (orig. repr. Gr. Gamma) was employed for the k sound, and the letter K fell into disuse, except in a few archaic spellings.

In Old English, K is merely a supplemental symbol occasionally used instead of C for the guttural sound. But after the Conquest, in accordance with the Norman usage, C was retained for the guttural only before a, o, u, l, r, and K was substituted for the same sound before e, i, y, and (later) n. Hence, in native words, initial K now appears only before e, i, y, and before n (:—OE. cn-), where it is no longer pronounced in Standard English. Medially and finally, k is used after a consonant (ask, twinkle), or long vowel (make, like, week); after a short vowel, ck is used instead of cc or kk, but the unstressed suffix, formerly -ick (musick), is now -ic, though, when a suffix in e or i follows, k reappears (traffic, trafficker, trafficking).

The native K words, being thus confined to Ke-, Ki-, Kn-, are few. But many foreign words of recent adoption, instead of being spelt with C before a, o, u, l, r, h, now take K in these positions; and in words from Greek also, many prefer to retain K, instead of latinizing it to C. In a very few words (not of English formation), K represents Gr. χ, esp. in the words in kilo-, as kilogramme, etc.
